

Carnegie Council Announces Global Ethics Day, October 19, 2016

Carnegie Council announces its third annual Global Ethics Day (#gloablethicsday2016) on October 19, 2016.

Inspired by Earth Day, Global Ethics Day provides an opportunity for organizations around the world to hold events exploring the meaning of ethics in international affairs.

We encourage academic institutions everywhere to use this day to hold programs focusing on ethics, such as lectures, film screenings, debates, or panel discussions. We welcome your ideas. In the tradition of a "teach-in" model, these events will be run by each institution as it sees fit while being part of a worldwide Global Ethics Day.

Carnegie Council will promote Global Ethics Day activities on its online community platform www.gloablethicsnetwork.org and share any resources that are created. Course and lecture ideas can be found on Carnegie Council's website at <http://www.carnegiecouncil.org/education/index.html>.

Sixty-eight institutions worldwide participated last year. Here are just a few examples of events in 2015: Carnegie Council, along with Global Citizen and Johns Hopkins University, co-hosted an event focused on finding strategies to fight food insecurity; Texas Tech University (TTU) Ethics Center held a filibuster on legal, environmental and migration ethics; and gloablethics.net chose responsible leadership as its main theme.

"Although it's only a couple of years old, Global Ethics Day is gaining momentum every year," says Carnegie Council Senior Fellow Devin Stewart. "We hope you'll join us in 2016 and host an event on whatever aspect of global ethics concerns you most. Carnegie Council's slogan is 'Ethics Matter.' Help us make this a reality."

If you plan to hold a Global Ethics Day event, please let us know so we can promote it along with other events happening that day. Please contact Alex Woodson at awoodson@cceia.org and let us add your name to the list!
